WEI NESDAY EVENING, OCT. 28 1896.

THE GEISHA AS SHE 18.

Japanese Singing Girls a Peculiar Feature of the Country. In a Jap teahouse in Tokyo of a pleasant afternoon.

Each room consists of one large apartment, and by means of light bamboo and paper screens that slide in grooves in floor and ceiling this apartment can be swiftly divided into a number of cozy, private rooms.

The guests sat in a circle on the matting, and the girls bring lacquer trays and small tables, on which are placed tiny teapots and delicate, shell-like cups. The girls now pour out and hand around the tea, each as she offers her cup prostrating herself before the guest, saying, "Honorably deign to accept this tea." After this they bring in bottles of "sake," the wine of the country, made from rice, and recalling to an American or European palate the If, however, it has been the habit to flavor of dry sherry. This is mixed with warm water and drunk out of tiny porcelain cups.

Square boxes, containing each a little pot of charcoal, an ashbox and a spittoon, are also placed here and there about the floor. The Jap uses a very finely cut mild and bitter tasting tobacco, which he smokes, a pinch at a time, in a tiny metal pipe, only containing enough to give him three or four puffs. From time to time he taps the ashbox, empties his pipe and starts afresh.

Meanwhile the host has sent for the "geishas," or trained singing and dancing girls, who now arrive and are ushered with great ceremony into the room.

The class to which these girls belong forms one of the most quaint and interesting institutions even in this pre-eminently quaint and interesting country.

They seldom take part in the temple ceremonies, but are trained to play the "samisen," or Japanese guitar, to sing and dance and to minister to the entertainment of the guests at social festivities.

As a rule they are bought from their parents at a very early age by some entrepeneur, thoroughly trained in the arts pertaining to their calling and then hired out by him at a large figure.

He picks them for their good looks and provides them with rich and beautiful clothing, and a "geisha" who is bright, amusing and attractive generally succeeds in gaining the affection of some rich admirer, who buys her from the entrepeneur and establishes her. Of late years, since the rapid influx of western ideas, there has been an attempt made to induce the government to do away with the "geishas" altogether.

The mikado has set the example by banishing them from the court entertainments and the banquets of state, and the government has put a tax upon them, but in spite of all this the custom of employing them at private parties is one that will die very hard.

All sorts of conflicting opinions about the "geisha," her personal appearance and her ways and manners, have been expressed by different foreign critics.

The "geisha" is "sui generis" a creature alone and apart, and her quaint little painted and enameled face, her penciled eyebrows and artificially carmined lips, her shiny black hair, stiffened with gum and built up into the most fantastic and elaborate structure; above all, her beautiful costume, with its soft and subtle harmonies of color and graceful draping, all go to make her a personality that is as charming as it is different from anything one can see elsewhere in the world.—Boston
